Officials working on the transition are considering creating a commission to investigate the 2021 withdrawal from Afghanistan, including gathering information about who was directly involved in the decision-making for the military, how it was carried out, and whether the military leaders could be eligible for charges as serious as treason, the U.S. official and person with knowledge of the plan said.

The Ottawa Senators keep showing signs of excellence this season, but simply can't find any traction. After winning two straight, the Senators have now lost two straight, falling 4-0 in Carolina on Saturday night.

The Senators didn't have their best stuff early on, but that paled in comparison to the performance of the officiating team.

Sens goalie Anton Forsberg was excellent, keeping Ottawa in the game in the first period. His one mistake was a doozy, though, allowing a Jordan Martinook goal from down below the goal line.

That was the only blemish in the first half of the game and the Sens slowly started getting their legs under them. Midway through the second period, Tim Stutzle appeared to tie the game at 1, but on the backswing of his shot attempt, his stick clipped Andrei Svechnikov's stick. Svechnikov was backchecking with one hand on his stick and the contact of Stutzle's backswing knocked the stick out of his hand.
